Once upon a time, in a small town nestled between mountains and whispering trees, there lived a little girl named Nelly. Nelly had a big dream—she wanted to learn to read. But there was a problem. In Nelly’s town, there weren’t many schools, and her family didn’t have enough money to send her to one.

Every day, Nelly watched with wide eyes as other children walked to school, laughing with their friends, colorful backpacks bouncing on their shoulders. She longed to join them, to immerse herself in the magical world of books and stories. But she couldn’t read a single word.

One day, Nelly decided she couldn’t wait any longer. With determination in her heart and a twinkle in her eyes, she walked up to her parents. “I want to learn to read,” she declared.

Her parents exchanged worried glances. They wanted the best for Nelly, but they didn’t know how to teach her themselves. Still, they saw the fire in her eyes and promised to help her in any way they could.

Nelly’s parents searched the town, looking for books. They borrowed from neighbors, visited the local library, and even rummaged through dusty boxes in the attic. Slowly but surely, they gathered a small collection of books for Nelly to practice with.

Together with her parents, Nelly dove headfirst into the world of reading. It was difficult at first. The letters danced and twisted on the page, refusing to make sense. But Nelly was determined. She practiced sounding out the words, letter by letter, every day. Slowly but surely, the words began to form meaning in her mind.

Months passed, and Nelly’s hard work paid off. She could read simple stories on her own, and it felt like a whole new world had opened up to her. She devoured book after book, losing herself in tales of adventure, friendship, and magic.

One day, as Nelly sat in her room with her nose buried in a book, her parents peeked in, smiles of pride on their faces. “Look at our little reader,” they whispered to each other.

Sensing their presence, Nelly looked up, a smile stretching from ear to ear. “I did it,” she said. “I learned to read.”
