

Short Story of The Crow And The Peacock with Morals - Download PDF Copy

Once upon a time, in a green forest full of birds and rustling leaves, there lived an intelligent crow named Carl. Carl was known among all the forest creatures for his cleverness and wit. But despite his intelligence, Carl often felt sad when he saw other birds, especially a beautiful peacock named Perry.

Perry had magnificent feathers that glistened in the sunlight in every color imaginable. When Perry spread his tail, all the birds and animals flocked to admire him, and this made Carl very jealous.

One day, Carl decided he couldn't take it anymore. He wanted to be as admired as Perry. So he came up with a plan. He waited until Perry displayed his feathers and then left. Carl sneaked up and grabbed some of Perry's brightly colored feathers, then tucked them between his own black feathers.

Proud of his new look, Carl strutted around the forest. At first, from a distance, the other animals gasped and whispered, "Look at Carl! He looks so colorful and handsome!" But when they got closer, they realized what Carl had done.

The wise old owl, who saw everything from her tree, called out gently, "Carl, you're a unique and wise bird. Why try to be something you're not?"

Carl felt ashamed. He realized that he had made a mistake by trying to steal Perry's beauty instead of appreciating his own qualities. He apologized to Perry and pulled out the borrowed feathers. Perry, being kind and forgiving, just laughed and ruffled his feathers.

From that day on, Carl learned to appreciate his own skills and qualities. He understood that every bird in the forest had something special, and for him, it was his intelligence and wit.

And the moral of the story is: "Be proud of who you are and appreciate your own qualities, because imitation is not the path to true admiration."

Short Story of The Crow And The Peacock with Morals - Download
PDF Copy

Download PDF File: